

Thirsty for Success?

Karina Harris was fed up with home business opportunities that kept going under. Now she's living her dreams thanks to something as simple as water.

Think about the last time you had a glass of water. Maybe it was at the gym after a long workout, or in front of the television while waiting for your favorite show to start, or when you washed down that last bite of salad on your lunch break. The fact is, you and millions of others across the country drink a combined 6.4 billion gallons of H₂O each year.

Wouldn't it be nice if there was a product that took advantage of that trend?

Karina Harris thought so. In May, the 36-year-old Washington resident started a home business with Enagic, a Japanese-based company that produces alkaline-rich water called Kangen. Six months later and happily married, she's making five figures a month, has allowed her husband, Greg, to retire from his nine-to-five job, and spends her time having fun with her husband while spreading the word about how something as simple as water can change your life.

"People are building this business as easily as giving people the water and having them try it," Karina says. "It sounds elementary, but it's truly amazing. Many people feel a difference in 24 hours. This gets down to the cellular level, and it absorbs so fast that they can get quick relief."

Speaking of quick relief, that's exactly what an opportunity with Enagic gave Karina. Even though she's in her mid-thirties, Karina is no stranger to the home business industry; she's been involved with various companies on and off for the past seven years, but kept running into similar problems with each one—poor management, a lack of security and inadequate compensation plans.

"The biggest problems were the companies failing," Karina remembers. "It's a big heartache and it's hard to start over. You never want to. When you go to the top of the start-up businesses, you fall the hardest when they go under. I love the industry but I was unimpressed with what was out there."

Just as her frustration began to mount, Enagic popped up on Karina's radar, courtesy of a friend in the industry. After some research revealed that Enagic has a 45-year track record of success in Japan, a simple product with real health benefits and a history of making millionaires, Karina was extremely interested. She even purchased a machine of her own so she could have her own unlimited supply of Kangen water from home.

"The more research I did, the more I was amazed, not only with the product, but because the income potential is bigger than anything in the United States," Karina says. "There are companies where you have a handful of people at the top who become millionaires. But in Japan, there are hundreds who are millionaires with Enagic."

The reason the company has been so successful overseas and is growing rapidly in the United States is simple—the product works. Enagic uses electrolysis to produce Kangen water (a Japanese word meaning "return to origin"), a drink rich in disease-fighting antioxidants. What does that all mean? Basically, it allows your body to absorb water at the cellular level and flush toxins out of the body.

"Everyone drinks water, and everyone thinks they can drink bottled water," Karina says. "But bottled water is acidic, and sickness and disease thrive in an acidic environment. With Enagic, they can have an unlimited supply of non-acidic (alkaline) water in their own home."

Enagic's machines have been proven to be so successful in the medical field that the Japanese Ministry of Health and Labor (the Japanese equivalent to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration) approved it as a medical device for hospitals throughout the country. They made their first home unit in 1997 and distributed their product through independent direct sellers, recently crossing the Pacific Ocean into the United States and other parts of the globe.

And people in the U.S. are beginning to take notice. Karina is earning over $20,000 a month just six months after starting, and because she gets paid daily (yes, daily), Karina never has to wonder when the next check is in the mail.

Because of her financial freedom, Karina can live the lifestyle she wants. Her parents are farmers who were hit hard by the recent downturn in the agricultural industry, but Karina's income allows her parents to receive their own mailbox money. Greg retired from his position as a superintendent for a construction company...although Karina still plans on putting him to work.

TOTAL HAPPINESS: Karina Harris and her husband, Greg, have molded their Enagic home business around their hobbies. Now, something as enjoyable as playing golf doubles as a chance to grow their business.

"Now he can build me my own dream house," she cracks.

Rather than tailor her lifestyle around work, Karina decided to do it the other way around. An avid golfer and travel buff, she and Greg have made it a goal to see as many of the world's golf courses as possible...and thanks to her home business, she can take her work along with her.

After all, what happens when you're golfing? You get thirsty. And with Karina on hand to teach people about the difference between Kangen water and ordinary bottled water, it's a snap to get customers right on the spot. And it's not just golf. Chances are you know hundreds of people who drink water—and every one of them is a potential customer that can help grow your business.

"Everywhere we go, everyone drinks water," Karina explains. "If I educate people on the choice, they can live a fun, healthy life and still enjoy their business and hobbies." ■
